| About Faculty : | Committed to academic excellence, research innovation, and meaningful community engagement. Throughout his professional journey, he has consistently worked toward integrating teaching, research, and social responsibility into a cohesive and purposeful career. His contributions to higher education are centered on nurturing engineers who are not only technically competent but also socially aware and ethically grounded. His academic and professional development reflects a balanced combination of scholarly pursuit, institutional service, technological innovation, and community-oriented initiatives. He firmly believes that the role of a faculty member extends far beyond classroom instruction. In addition to teaching, he actively engages in mentoring students, guiding research, participating in administrative responsibilities, and contributing to societal development. In the classroom, he promotes interactive and experiential learning methodologies such as case-based discussions, real-time project demonstrations, collaborative assignments, and research-driven mini projects. He strives to create an intellectually stimulating environment where students are encouraged to question concepts, explore new ideas, innovate solutions, and apply their knowledge to real-world challenges. By integrating current industry practices, emerging technologies, and interdisciplinary perspectives into his teaching, he effectively bridges the gap between theory and practical application. He strongly believes that education should extend beyond the confines of the classroom and play a vital role in societal upliftment. As an educator in Computer Science and Engineering, he views himself not only as a teacher but also as a mentor, researcher, technologist, and community contributor. Through continuous learning, collaborative research, and active engagement with the community, he remains dedicated to advancing higher education and contributing meaningfully to societal progress. |
